AT THE COLONIAL.

Shanty Moir (Jack Meredith).

Shanty Moir (Jack Meredith).

Shanty Moir is the terror of "Fifty-mile" camp, a mining settlement in the great north country. He operates a gold mine, the location of which he keeps secret. By brute force he compels Roy MscGreggor, half owner of the mine, to do the work of a horse. He intends to kill him when the gold supply is exhausted. Hattie, MacGreggor's daughter, is rescued by Bivers, known as the Snowburner, at "Hell" camp She and her uncle are searching for Shanty, whom they think has killed her father. After hearing the fate of MacGreggor, Rivers decides to locate the gold mine. Fretending to be a half wit, he goes to "Fifty-mile" camp where he meets Shanty and allows him to take him to the mine as a siave. After he has learned the location of the mine and found MacGreggor alive, he kills Shanty in a handto-hand aght. Taking all the gold Shanty possessed, Rivers starts back to "Hell" camp with MacGreggor adaughter, Hattic, sees her father still alive, she throws her arms about Rivers leading the Gircus Caine to Town, Selig drama; A Telegraphic Tange, Vitagraph drama, and Smoop Hounds, a Kalem comedy, are other pictures on today's program.

Birdseye Maple Marks.

The birdseye mark so familiar in maplewood has been a source of much speculation, one theory attributing it to some mysterious action of frest and another and more popular explanation being that the curious knotty spots are scars resulting from holes pecked by sapsuckers in the trunk of the young tree. A reply to the second theory is that hickory, though its bark is often perforated like a collander by the sapsuckers, shows no effect except wood that is discolered and made unsightly. American Forestry shows that the phenomenon is so simple that a good magnifying glass makes it clear, the birdseye figure being really produced by adventitious buds which have their origin under the hark, and may begin to develop when the tree is quite small. These huds, though they may live many years or die and be replaced by others, are rayely able to force their way through the bark to become branches. The sapanese are said to produce artificial birdseye growth by inserting buds beneath the bark a sample of the artificially-produced birdseye wood being in the Field Mugeum, Chi-
